Luce Fish Works to Be Located at Egg Harbor, N. J .- Spiritualists Plan for State Day.

Benjamin D. Luce of New York, son of Capt. Edward Luce, and Lincoln G. Luce, son of Edward C. Luce, are to engage in the bony-fishing business at Egg Harbor, N. J., as they could not secure a suitable location in this vicinity to creet a fish mill. They have already purchased one steamer and expect to secure another fish factory building equipped with all necessary machinery for cooking the fish and making oil and fertilizer on a large scale. There is a large amount of profit in this business as long as there is plenty of fish in the sea. It is regretted that the young men are obliged to leave Niantic and locate their business so far away. But the people in this vicinity will not tolerate any more fish mills.

To Lecture on Temperance. James William Connell, who is staying in the village, spoke at Quaker Hill Sunday in the Baptist church on "The Fighting Chance." #### HOW THE CONFIDENCE OF BIRDS IS WON

beneath. The bird was evidently killed by a cat in the night. I saw the male at the nest twice and heard it complaining near by.

The latter part of May, I came scross a bouquet of dried grasses and grains, which I did not care for, so I tied it to the grape-vine arbor thinking a bird might eat the seeds. One day I saw a warbling virce on the grasses, it was so fearless that I stood within a few feet and watched it, as it broke off pieces, from one to two inches in length, from the avons on the heads of the barley. When it had a few pieces, both that and its mate, which waited near by, would fly sway always in the same direction. They came many times for two days.

One summer a pair built their basket shaped pensile nest in a maple in our yard. One could see from the doorway, the tiny bird sitting on the nest and pouring forth its happy song by the hour. Leander S. Keyser, in his interesting book, "News from the Bords," has given a very correct description of the song. He says, "What a musician the warbling virso is! He keeps up an incessant flow of song-task often for hours. — Now he runs up to a very high note in the scale and now to a low one.
And what does he seem to say? "Dear, de-a-r, this is pleasant, pl-e-a-sant, swing in the branches. The sun shines so brightly, so-o b-r-i-shtl-y-y-y!
I'm so happy, hap-p-y-y, h-a-a-p-py!'
All this is blended and woven together in a really wonderful mesh of

All this is blended and woven together in a really wonderful mesh of

Probably it was the male, which I have read shares in the labor of incubation, that sung so joyously for us. To my sorrow, trouble in the shape of a red squirrel, scon came to them and the nest was broken up.

At my old home the wrene have a nest in the box on the window sill, where they raised a family last year.
I hoped to have a pair at the new home and hung up two crookneek squash shells, which are favorite nesting places for them, but have not seen one around. I especially miss the chickadees and pair of nuthatches, which were so tame at the old home.
Last year the chickadees, which hatched about June 10th, were taken away at the end of two weeks by Markie and Matie. The last of July the adults came back alone. They were not se tame as they had been, but would come to my hand. They did not stay around all the time through August and September. On October 12th a new one came to the window and ate crumbs, but Markie was eo cross to it that it did not learn to come to my hand until the 4th of November. The next day there were four, by the end of the third week in December there were six and occasionally a new one joined them until there were ten or more. After watching the tame ones a few days a new one would venture to my hand for food, and after a few attempts showed but little fear of me.
Markie did not seem to care when they went to their shelf for food, but resented their coming to me, and flew frantically from one to another in his effort to drive them away; but there were so many that while he was chasing one the others would come. Sometimes, to help them, I would give Markie a large piece of nut so that he would fly away to est or hide it. One rainy day Markie and Marie picked off and hid many poison ivy berries in the wet green linhens on the old apple trees.

Burial of George Chapman.

The body of George Chapman, aged S, who died at Berlin, Conn., was brought to the cemetery for burial three. Of the three the pair were not very friendly with the odd one, which stopped coming about the middle of March. The pair did not come after the 3d of April, when the male carried food from my hand to his little mate in a tree—an act which showed that they interests would soon be centered in nest building. They evidently selected a home in a less dangerous region. Some weeks before leaving they sat for their pictures. Although the camera was within a few feet, they were not afmid and did not need to be told to "look pleasant."

The pair of nuthatchers, the male of which had fed from my hand for three winters, came again last winter. The female would come to my hand, when her mate was not too independent and the chickadees too numerous. The male was very tame. I would sit in the doorstep against the post, which supports the arm. When Nuttle saw me he would fly to the rail, walk down my arm to my hand, where he would trand and eat. Sometimes I scattered the food on my lap for him. He made it evident that he had no desire for "those saucy little chickadees" to eat with him, so they usually waited, ed the food on my lap for him. He made it evident that he had no desire for "those saucy little chickadees" to eat with him, so they usually waited, perhaps on my head or shoulder. Sometimes when a haif dozen were fluttering about, he thought it beneath his dignity to remain in so trivolous a company, so fiew away with a loud "quank! quank!" When I moved they had not left for the home building and still came for food, but a week later they would pay no attention to offers of food, they were so interested in each other. A few days ago I heard a nuthatch, so dropped my work, as the boys are said to their hoes when the clock strikes six, and hurried out with needs and nuts, hoping that I might find Nuttle and Lady. There were a pair traveling up and down a heighbor's tree. Aithough they did not show any interest in me, I was delighted to see them, for I live in hope that when the "north wind doth blow" and the snow comes, they will be giad to stay to dinner when they come my way.
